5.why Are Many Strategic Alliances Temporary

in any case, the largest number of temporary migrant workers are in the agriculture industry in the united states, followed by the hotel, restaurant, and hospital industries. 5 as of 2007, american employers relied on the h-2b and l-1 visa programs to recruit approximately 482,000 temporary migrant workers for agriculture occupations.6 and this number is set to continue to grow in the near future. in a highly competitive global economy, it is common for these companies to hire temporary migrant workers from a range of other countries. the industry standard for a temporary worker is an initial contract of employment lasting for around two years. however, many agricultural employers offer local employees more-stable hours, higher wages, and better benefits than most employment contract offerings. in addition to agriculture, there are also several public-sector employers, such as those in the education, health care, and construction industries, who rely on temporary migrant workers. although the reasons for the growth of tlmps are numerous and include the near-term imbalances between supply and demand for workers in various industries and u.s. labor force characteristics in terms of unskilled workers and high-skilled workers, the long-term decline in the u. birth rate and the aging of the u. population have been cited most often as the main force behind the growth of tlmps. a third explanation is that some managers believe that the right response to a rising tide of global trade and integration is to fight back with more trade and deeper integration. thus, they believe that alliances are, at best, a way to keep out would-be competitors. in the long run, however, this approach has proven to be far more toxic than beneficial.
