All these biometrics have the same purpose: you are authenticating your identity to a computer or system. It would be possible to create a device that would have all the functions of a biometric system, including authentication, and store the needed data so that if a person stole a computer with a biometric system built in he or she would not be able to use it (much like the authentication token described above). This device is a biometric security card or dongle. A simple example of a biometric security card would be a fingerprint reader that uses a chip and an embedded circuit board that stores the data (the fingerprint in this case) so that it can be read later. How a biometric security system works is beyond the scope of this article, but as you can see in the videos above it is well suited for computers and systems that are too complex for a Password to secure. The only requirement is that the user does not have a means to reset the system (for example: not have access to the master password in the case of a fingerprint or retinal scan dongle). So to bring this article full circle, the Type 3 Dongle is a device that takes a specific form of information from a user or animal that is unique to that person. It has the ability to connect to the computer or system that the user wants to access and contains the information necessary to authenticate the user. It would be possible to create a device that has all the functions of a dongle, including authentication, and store the needed data so that the device can be used to authenticate that specific device or computer.
